Q: Is there a Mule 3.2 style package that allows me to use Mule components without Spring? I have an application running in Mule 3.2. I am replacing a component based architecture with a Mule component based architecture. I am finding I need to use a number of Spring libraries in order to have the Spring managed components. Is there some way I can create a package that I can use with my Mule file that is not Spring based so I do not need to declare Spring components? A: A Mule flow doesn't need to be Spring based, the application itself is Spring based the whole flow can be Spring based the Mule expression language components can be Spring based but also Mule components can be non-Spring based the flow itself can be without any Spring component like just mule and payload the access to storage can be non-Spring based It really depends on your domain of application and the overall application design.
